The Rainbow Wand and the Big Apology

By Palak Kamthan

Nobita and Doraemon were the very best of friends. Every afternoon, they played together in Nobita's room on the soft tatami mats. Doraemon was a wonderful robot cat from the future who was always ready to help Nobita with a clever gadget from his 4D belly pocket.

Today, Doraemon reached into his magic pocket and pulled out something amazing. It was a Rainbow-Cloud Wand! "If we wave this, we can make clouds that look like colorful cotton candy," Doraemon explained. Nobita's eyes went wide with wonder.

"Let me try!" Nobita cried. He reached for the wand, but Doraemon held it back. "Wait, Nobita! You have to be careful, or the clouds will turn into a rainstorm," Doraemon warned. But Nobita was too excited to wait. He grabbed the middle of the wand and pulled as hard as he could.

Suddenly, there was a loud SNAP. The Rainbow-Cloud Wand broke into two pieces. "Look what you did!" Nobita shouted, his face turning red. "It's your fault for being so stingy!" He threw his piece of the broken wand onto the floor with a loud thud.

Doraemon felt very sad inside. He didn't like being yelled at, especially by his best friend. Without saying a word, he picked up his half of the broken wand and walked toward the door. His blue head was down, and he felt very lonely.

Nobita sat on his floor and kicked a stray cushion. "I don't care," he muttered to the quiet room. "I can play by myself. I don't need Doraemon or his silly future toys." He tried to read a comic book, but he couldn't stop thinking about the fight. The room felt much too big and very empty.

As the sun began to set, Nobita saw a plate with a yummy Dorayaki pancake on the table. He remembered how much Doraemon loved those snacks and how they always shared them. His tummy felt heavy and tight. Being angry wasn't fun at all; it just felt very cold and lonely.

Outside, Doraemon sat all by himself on the roof of the house. He looked up at the moon and thought about all the adventures he and Nobita had shared. He missed Nobita's laughter. He realized that a broken toy could be fixed with tools, but a broken friendship needed something more.

Doraemon's eyes brightened up. He took the snack and gave Nobita a giant, warm hug. "I'm sorry too, Nobita," Doraemon said. Together, they went back inside to fix the wand. They learned that even when friends have a big fight, a kind word is the best magic of all.