
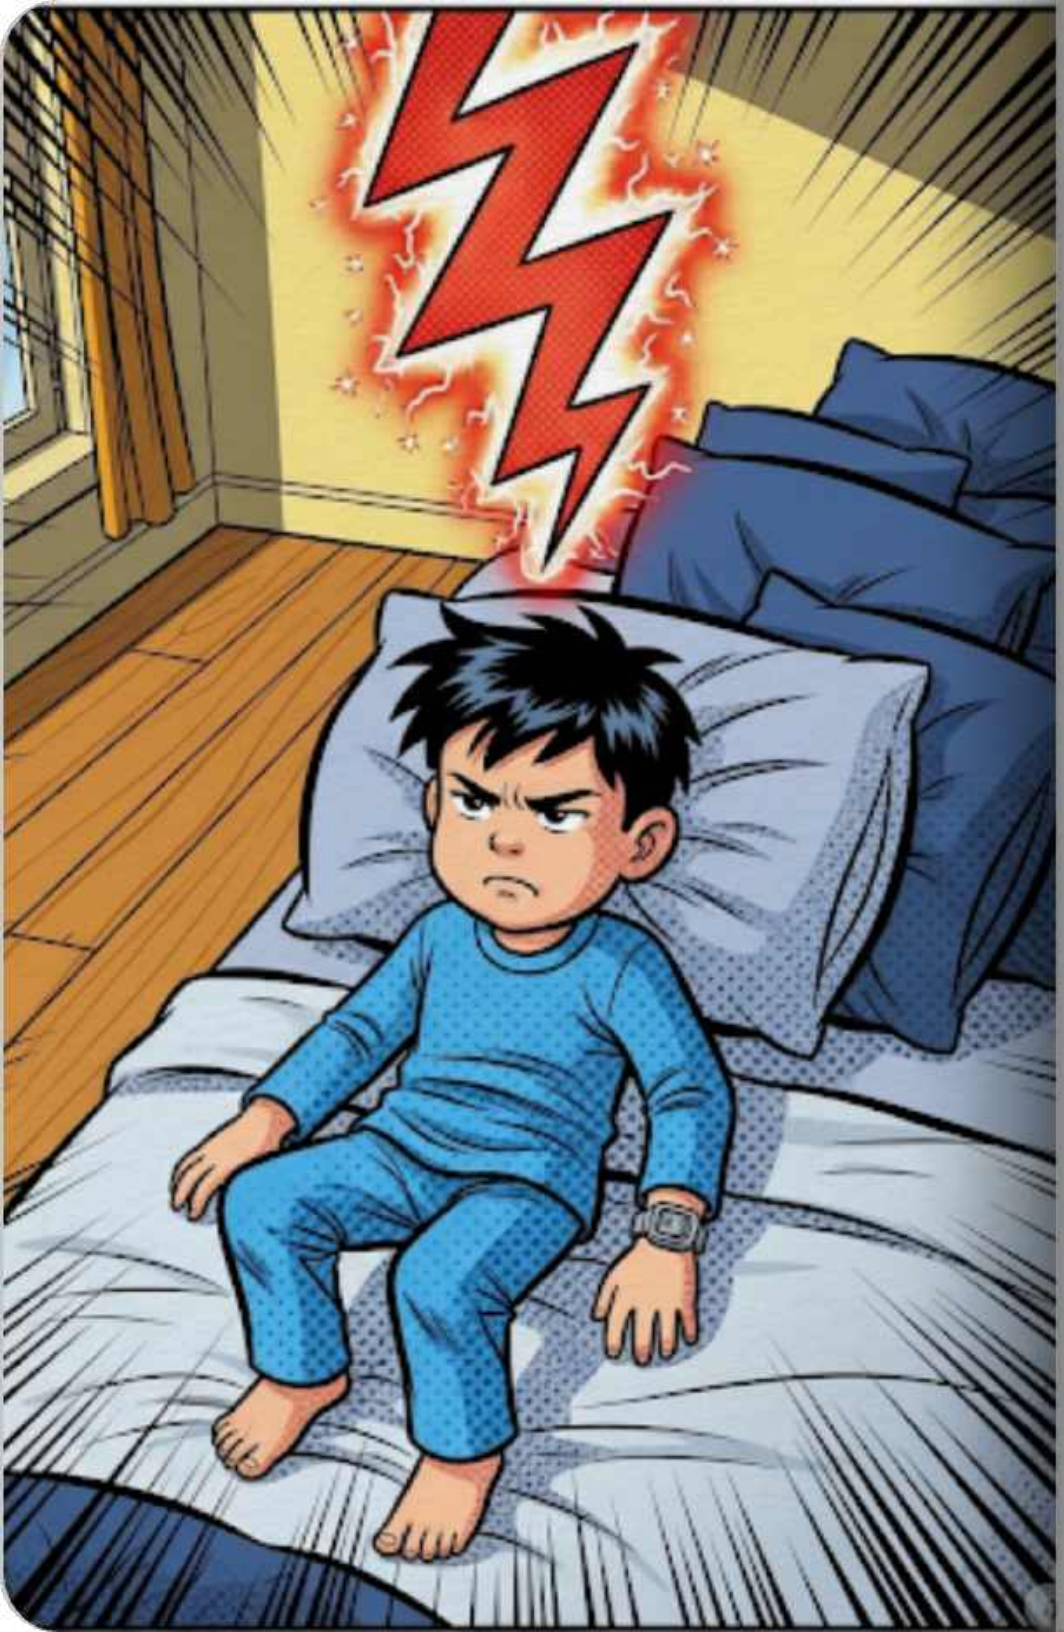
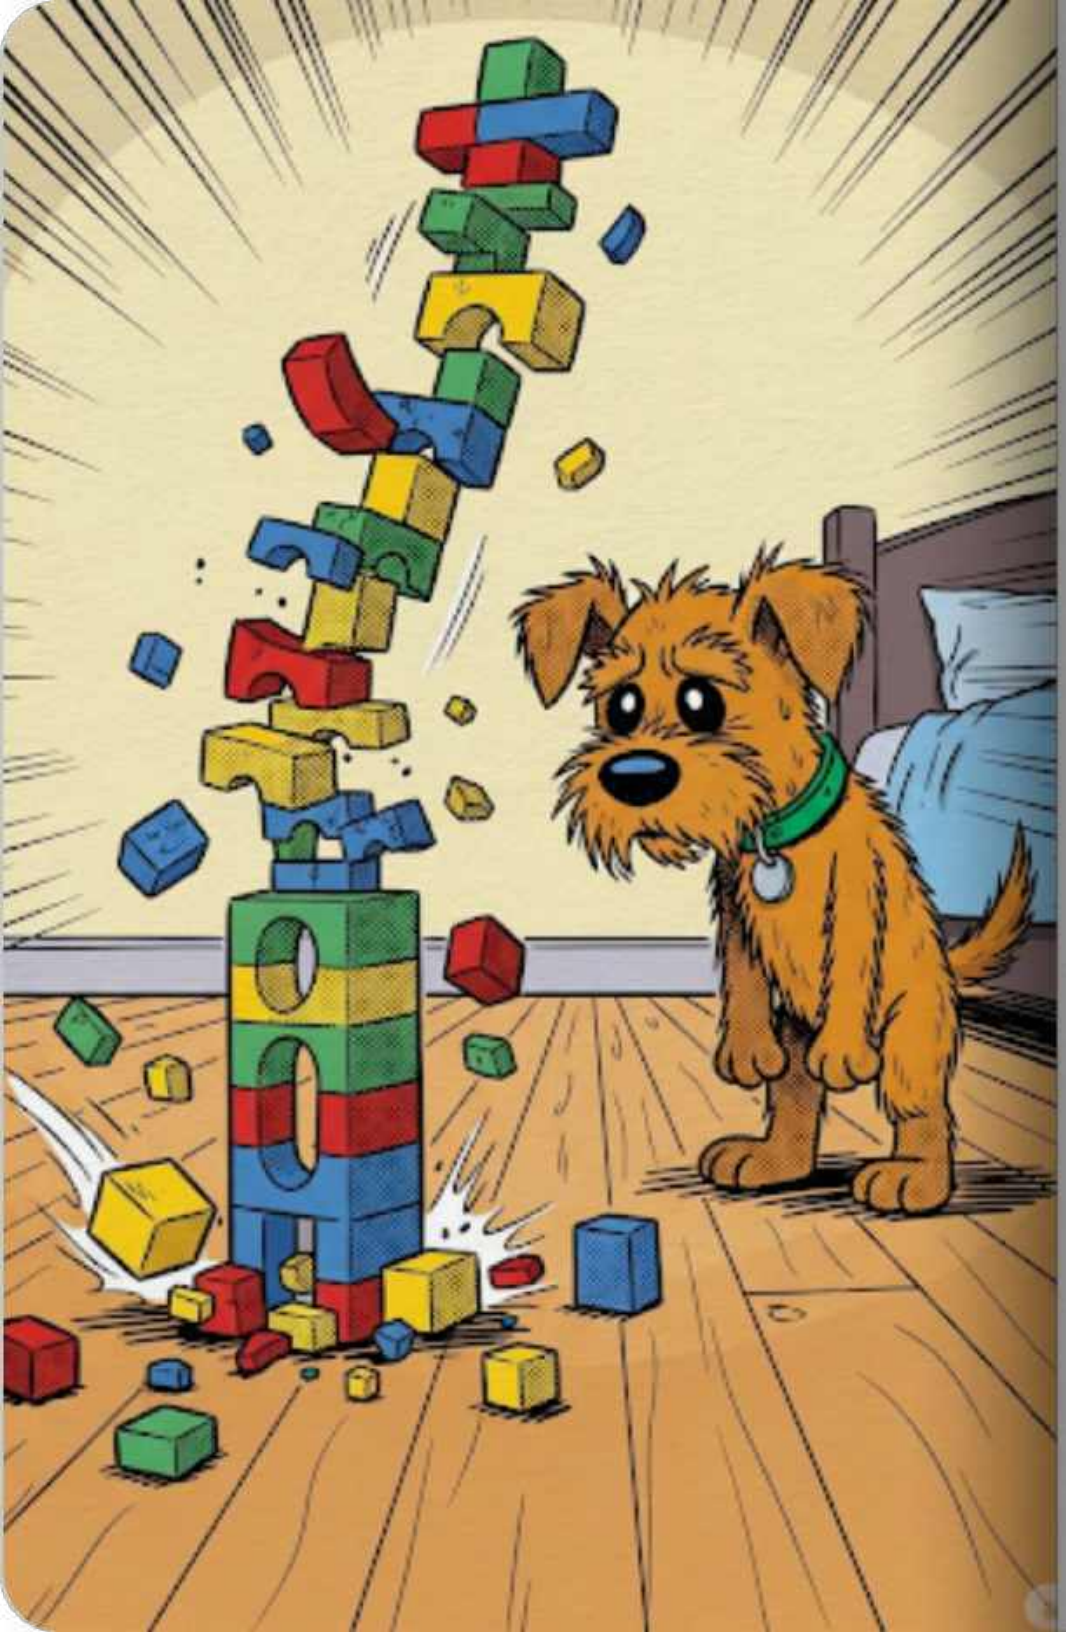
Zap and the Red Sizzle

By Kshipra



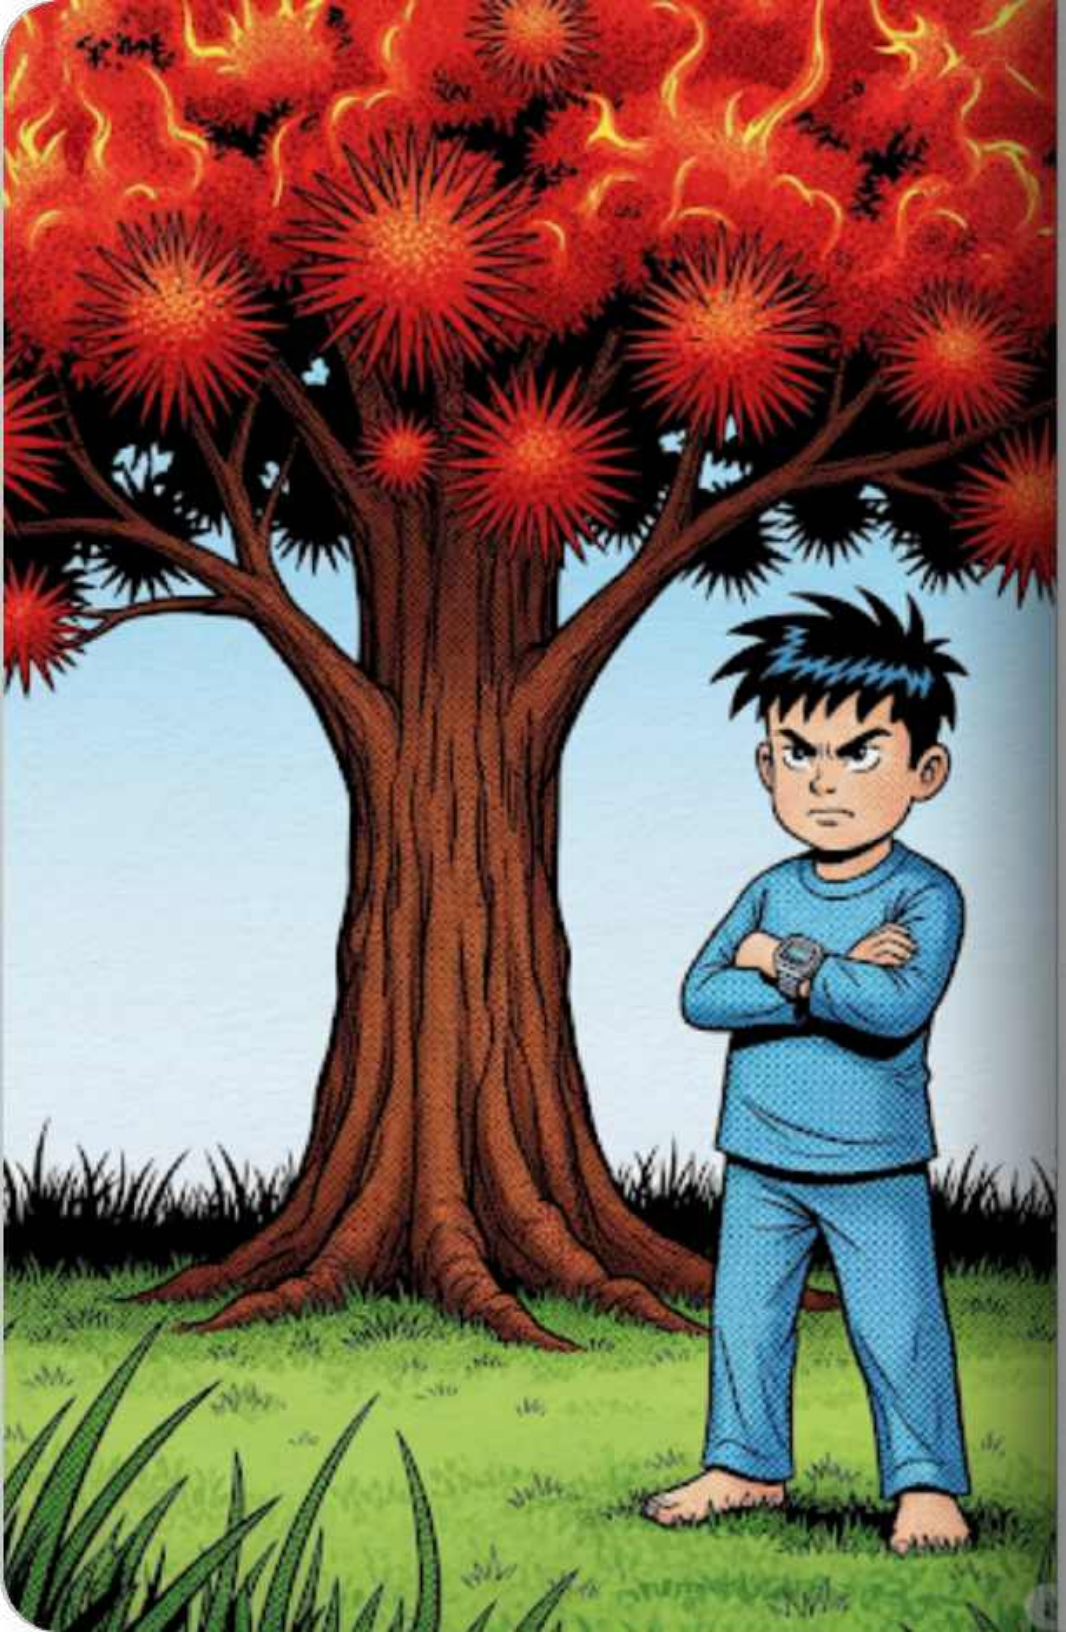
It was a very prickly Tuesday when Zap opened his eyes. He expected to feel rested, but instead, he saw a glowing, red-hot zigzag floating right above his head! His chest felt tight and his face felt warm. "What is that?" he grumbled.

Zap stomped out of bed and found his dog, Whiz. Whiz was excited, jumping up and down and barking loudly. The noise felt like a hammer hitting a nail in Zap's head. "Quiet, Whiz!" Zap snapped. Whiz stopped mid-bounce,



Whiz tried to cheer Zap up by bringing him a ball, but he accidentally skidded into Zap's favorite tower of blocks. CRASH! The blocks tumbled in every direction. Whiz looked at the mess and let out a small, worried

Zap felt like a tea kettle about to whistle. "Look what you did!" he cried. Suddenly, a shadow stretched across the floor. It wasn't a normal shadow; it was shaped like a giant, jagged red bolt. The Red Sizzle had become a Great



In the backyard, everything looked different through Zap's angry eyes. The grass didn't look soft; it looked sharp. Right in the middle of the yard stood a new tree with spiky, fire-red leaves. Zap stopped and stared. "This tree

Whiz crept up to the red tree, sniffing the trunk carefully. He reached out a paw and touched a low-hanging, spiky branch. CRACKLE! The tree made a sharp, snapping sound like a spark of static. Whiz yelped and jumped back, his fur

Zap saw how scared Whiz was and felt a little pang in his heart. He didn't want Whiz to be afraid. He noticed a smooth, blue handle hidden among the angry red leaves. He looked at Whiz, then at the handle. "I think I need to change this,"

As the door in the tree trunk opened, a wave of cool, blue mist poured out. Zap stepped inside and felt the heat leave his face. In this secret room, the air was quiet and smelled like rain. Zap felt his feet leave the ground as he began to

The mist cleared, and Zap found himself sitting on the grass with Whiz's head in his lap. The spiky red tree was gone, replaced by a normal oak with soft green leaves. Zap felt calm and quiet inside. He knew the Red Sizzle might come